FUN FACT!

The average American consumes 23 gallons of beer a year.

FUN FACT!

Zythology is the study of beer.

FUN FACT!

The foamy "head," as it is called, is formed by a complex carbon-dioxide reaction and can say a lot about the quality of the beer.

FUN FACT!

Cenosilicaphobia is the fear of an empty glass.

BEER GLASS GUIDE

American Pint Glass

The most traditionally served and used glass. Typically holds 16oz. and goes great with most beers.

English/Imperial Pint Glass

Similar to the American Pint Glass, the Imperial has a slight lip at the top, holds more beer and is often served with English ales.

Beer Mug

Made with thick glass walls and a handle, the beer mug will keep your brew of choice cold and you refreshed.

Goblet

A larger and more exquisite glass that pairs well with heavy, malty beers, such as Belgian ales.

Pilsner Glass

Made with a slender design, the drinker can appreciate the colors and carbonation that comes with a lighter brew, such as Pilsners.

Weizen Glass

Built with a narrow bottom and a wider top, the aromas and foam from wheat beers are enhanced.

Snifter

Now rare to find in public, the snifter is great for enriching the aromas of strong flavored beers, such as Double IPAs.

Tulip Glass

Resembling the shape of a tulip, this glass creates a foamy head and enhances the nuances and flavors of a stronger brew.

Stange Glass

While bland in shape, this cylindrical glass intensifies the flavor of delicate beers, such as Kölsch.

Flute Glass

Shaped similarly to a champagne glass, the flute glass holds carbonation, allowing for aromas to amplify quickly.

ALES

Ales are full-bodied, with nuances of fruit or spice and a pleasantly hoppy finish. Generally robust and complex with a variety of fruit and malt aromas, ales come in many styles. Their coloring ranges from rich gold to reddish amber.

LAGERS

Lagers, which range from sweet to bitter and pale to black, are usually used to describe bottom-fermented brews of Dutch, German, and Czech styles. Lager originates from the German word 'lagern' which means 'to store'. This refers to the method of storing it for several months in near-freezing temperatures. Longer aging makes lagers crisp and refreshing with a smooth finish. Most are a pale to medium color, have high carbonation, and a medium to high hop flavor.

PORTERS

Porter are dark, almost black, fruity-dry, top fermenting styles, brewed with a combination of roasted malt to impart flavor, color and aroma.

STOUTS

Stouts are also black, roast brews made by top fermentation. Although it's not as sweet to the taste as porters, it features a rich, creamy head and is flavored and colored by barley. Stouts often use a portion of unmalted roasted barley to develop its dark, coffee-like character.

MALTS

Generally dark and sweeter in flavor, malts contain hints of caramel, toffee, and nuts. They can be light to full bodied.

GRUITS

Gruits are old fashioned herb mixtures used for bittering and flavoring beer before the extensive use of hops. The flavor, aroma, and color can range based on the kinds of herbs used.
